This type of bonus is the one you're almost guaranteed to see in a casino. As a new player, you receive a sign-up bonus to get you started.

There are different bonus levels that every casino sets on its own. When you're not sure whether you should spend real money on a new casino, it's a great way to test the software with no further consequences.

As the name suggests, it's a small bundle of bonus funds that requires no deposit. In effect, it's another version of free cash to play with. Casinos offer a wide range of different amounts, but most commonly, bonuses are worth around $5 to $10. Even though it's not a big sum, it's still something, considering you don't pay any of your own money upfront.

Bear in mind that these bonuses can have wagering requirements and game restrictions. Before you use any bonus, carefully go through the terms. Otherwise, it might not be as good of a gift as you expected.

In other places, the size of the monthly bonus depends on your activity during the previous month. So, the more you play on a given month, the more money you'll receive the next time.

Some establishments offer bonuses for using a specific payment vendor. For example, they can arrange a special deal with a certain e-wallet solution, and you'll get extra money every time you use it.
