While craps in and of itself are not considered one of the worst odds in casinos, some of the individual bets that go along with the game can be. For example, the Any 7 bet in Craps is considered one of the worst bets in the entire game.

The odds of winning are determined mostly by how many stops are made along the way while the wheel ticks around. The more stops the less your odds of winning become and the fewer stops, the more your odds of winning become.

To play, after placing a bet player is dealt two cards face up. If they are consecutive (such as 4/5 or J/Q), then the hand is a push, and the bet is returned. If they are a match, then a third card is dealt. If the new card is the same value then the players win at 11:1, else their bet is returned.

In the real world, there is nothing more devastating than war. In the casino world, there is no game more devastatingly boring than 'War'. It's a stupid name for a stupid game.

In all other circumstances, the 'spread' is announced, and a player may double their initial bet. The spread is the number of cards 'between' the two dealt. For example, if the cards are a 7 and a 10, then there is a two-card spread (8 and 9). A third card is dealt, and if it falls within the spread (in our example, is an 8 or a 9), then the player wins. The tighter the spread, the higher the payout.

One of the worst side bets in blackjack is also the most common – insurance. If you are offered insurance in blackjack, never take it.

Another common side bet turns the player's hand and the dealer's upcard into a three-card poker hand. This could be quite interesting, but the odds are stacked heavily against the player. Another side bet could be one on the number of sevens in a player's hand, paying out up to 5,000 times the player's bet for scoring 21 with three suited sevens. That might sound great, but again, the odds are stacked against the player.

If you want to throw away your money completely, then the best thing you can do is pump it into the kind of solo slot machine or pokie that you see in pubs, betting shops or other similar establishments. These machines are designed to draw you in and hook you with their flashing lights, bells, whistles and soundbites.

If you're not the shooter, there are several different bets you can make. The simplest bet is: Will the shooter win or lose on their next roll? Another bet you can make is whether the shooter will hit another number before he rolls a seven, or if they'll roll a seven or an eleven before they roll the point. Each bet is good for only the next roll.

There are 216 possible dice rolls in Sic Bo – 108 of them are ten or under, and 108 of them are eleven or over. The payout of Big/Small is 1:1, just like red/black or odd/even in roulette, but Sic Bo has its own version of '0/00' in that all triples lose. So, if you bet on Small and the dealer rolls 111, 222 or 333, then you lose.

Slot machines are famous for being able to bet small for a chance to win big. The problem is that while there is a possibility of winning big, it is hard to say just how much you have a chance of winning since most do not say.

This is a bet that relies on one roll of the dice and for you to predict that the total of that roll will add up to be 7. While the odds of this are not extremely bad, the payout rate is even worse. This is because the house edge is said to be close to 17%.

Your chances of coming out on top are so low you'd better off giving your money to charity. The RTP of such games can be as low as 75%, which is absolutely ridiculous when you think online slots can have RTPs as high as 95%.

If there is a push (you are both dealt the same value card) then you have to double your stake for new cards to be dealt, else you lose. You may find a version of War with a side bet, but even with that, this game is about as exciting as watching TV when the TV is switched off. The house edge is lousy too, and it's just a dull game. Play blackjack instead.

Sic Bo is full of 'sneaky' little rules that tip the edge from the player to the casino, so if you love dice games, you should play craps as opposed to Sic Bo.
